PREFACE

THIS VOLUME constitutes the first presentation in book form of any of the annual "period" bibliographies of English literature. Some account of its history may be in order.

In December, 1930, at the meeting of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America, in Washington, D. C., the present editor submitted a bibliography of publications (books, articles, and reviews) of 1930 that had a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period. Considerable interest was shown in the bibliography and the accompanying suggestion that it be followed by annual Victorian bibliographies.

When the Group met the next year, in Madison, Wisconsin, further interest was made evident. The newly-elected chairman, Professor Howard Mumford Jones, then of the University of Michigan, was authorized to appoint a bibliography committee. He asked the present editor to serve as chairman of such a committee, to aid in its formation, and to start it working. The following members of the Group agreed to help with the task, and were appointed members of the committee: Professor Frederic E. Faverty, Professor Charles Frederick Harrold, and Professor Helen C. White.

The task of making an annual bibliography could scarcely be willingly or effectively performed unless a satisfactory means of publication could be found. The Group had voted for this committee no directions as to procedure and no funds. The chairman of the committee consulted with Professor Ronald S. Crane, the managing editor of Modern Philology, published by the University of Chicago Press. Upon Professor Crane's recommendation, arrangements were made for the annual Victorian bibliographies to be printed in the May issues of Modern Philology.

The first Victorian bibliography appeared in Modern Philology for May, 1933. Experience showed that its style was not completely satisfactory. Consequently the number of sections in the next bibliography became four instead of five, some alteration was made in the section headings, and boldface type was used in order to name emphatically the individual authors dealt with in Section IV. The bibliographies have been essentially the same in style from 1934 to the present.

The following table shows the membership of the Bibliography Committee since its inception:

Charles Frederick Harrold (Ohio State University).....	1932-1944
Helen C. White (University of Wisconsin).....	1932-1934
Frederic E. Faverty (Northwestern University).....	1932-1940
Ruth C. Wallerstein (University of Wisconsin).....	1935
Charles W. Thomas (University of Wisconsin).....	1936-1938
Samuel P. Chew (University of Oklahoma).....	1939-1943
Austin Wright (Carnegie Institute of Technology).....	1941-1944
William Irvine (Stanford University).....	1944
William D. Templeman (University of Illinois), chairman..	1932-1944

The above-named persons have contributed most of the items that appear in the thirteen bibliographies. Professor Thomas acknowledged the assistance of Marjorie Hill, Rebecca Ruggles, and Viola Wendt during 1938. Professor Chew acknowledged the assistance of Leslie Rutledge during 1939. Professor Joseph G. Fucilla, of the Department of Romance Languages, Northwestern University, has kindly allowed the reprinting, on pages 215-22, of his bibliographical article from Modern Philology for August, 1939. Before its first appearance this article had been edited as a supplement to the Victorian Bibliography for 1937. Professor Carl J. Weber, of Colby College, has for several years kindly contributed numerous Hardy items.

The editor wishes to thank Professor Ronald S. Crane, the managing editor of Modern Philology; the late Professor Walter J. Graham, of the University of Illinois, who was helpful in the days before the committee was formed; Harrison E. Cunningham, Director of the University of Illinois Press; and Dean R. D. Carmichael, of the Graduate School of the University of Illinois, who aided in having publication of the book approved.

The University of Chicago Press has graciously allowed this reprinting from the pages of Modern Philology. The reproduction has been made as economically as possible—by photography. The original page numbers have been changed in order to permit continuous pagination, and the page headings have been made uniform. No other changes have been made. Additions are (1) this preface, (2) the foreword by Professor Howard Mumford Jones, and (3) the index, prepared by the editor, of the Victorian authors mentioned in the first four sections of the bibliography for 1932 and in the fourth section of each later bibliography.

FOREWORD

BIBLIOGRAPHIES, like filing systems, are dull but necessary foundations to organized large-scale activities. Because the study of nineteenth-century literature and culture is, by its very nature, one of the largest activities possible to literary scholarship, competent bibliographical "directives" are the more necessary. As one who once labored to put together, with friends, but on an amateur basis, a tentative bibliography in the Victorian field, I can testify to the fact that before the Victorian Group of the Modern Language Association set up the devoted and self-forgetting committee that created and now sustains the annual bibliography of Victorian studies, the inquirer had to spend sixty or seventy percent of his energies assembling materials for any research he did. It is the great glory of the committee to have forged an instrument for research that has done more for a proper understanding of the Victorian world than any other single achievement of the last fifty years in this field.

My name appears early in the preface. It doesn't really belong there. I happened to be chairman of the Group when the idea started, but the labor, the devotion, the patience, the critical selection have been the work of others. The work of the committee seems to me to show what cooperative enterprise can accomplish in the humanistic fields; and until humanists learn to work together on conjoint enterprises, as social scientists and scientists have learned to do, their progress is bound to lag behind that in these other sectors of learning. For that reason the achievement of this committee is all the more notable.

But let us go on with the bibliographies.

VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

— for 1932

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harrold, Michigan State Normal College; Helen C. White, University of Wisconsin; Frederic E. Faverty, Northwestern University. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1932 (including reviews of earlier items) which have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1932. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible.

Maintains an admirable objectivity; places Carlyle accurately in the setting of his period; provides excellent accounts of Edinburgh in Carlyle's youth, Chelsea in 1834, the great reviews and their readers, the new art of "puffing"; gives more attention to Carlyle's social and economic theories than to his philosophical, ethical, and critical doctrines; shows balance and restraint on the subject of Carlyle's marriage, and narrates the story of his life with considerable skill.—C. A short but closely reasoned analysis of the central conception underlying the Oxford movement; the Tractarians were seeking to return to "the old Anglican tradition that had its roots in the 17th century" and at the same time to reassert the great European Catholic tradition of the "incommensurability of Nature and Grace." The author departs from the usual treatment of the Tractarians by drawing heavily, and illuminatingly, upon the Lyra apostolica for expressions of their spirit and aims. A valuable book for a short and concrete exposition of the ecclesiastical and theological foundations of the movement.—C. F. HARROLD.

After the opening paragraphs of chapter iii, the movement as such tends to recede into the background, and the work as a whole becomes a socio-religious tract on the need for "clothing the natural order with its true supernatural significance," according to what the author conceives to have been one of the central ideals of Newman and Keble.—C. Gaskell (see also I, Parrish). Bull. of the John Rylands lib., XVII, 193-94, announces the acquisition of more than three hundred letters, presented by the executors of the late Miss M. E. Gaskell.

The letters, of which a large portion are addressed to Mrs. Gaskell, and are still in the envelopes in which they reached that lady, will be kept together, and will be known as "The Gaskell collection of letters."

It is not yet possible to form a correct estimate of the importance of this collection, but in due course it will be reduced to order and made accessible to students.

In the meantime, with the object of giving some idea of its value to the students of literature of the first half of the nineteenth century, we have selected, almost at random, the following names of noteworthy literary personalities of the period, whose letters are in this collection: Charles Dickens . . . thirty letters . . . : Matthew Arnold, Samuel Bamford, Thomas Lovell Beddoes, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Robert Browning, Thomas Campbell, Jane Carlyle, Thomas Carlyle, Richard Cobden, Sara Coleridge, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Mrs. D. A consideration and historical survey of Victorian literature from the standpoint of its relation to the social, economic, religious, and scientific problems of the age, especially in the light of the Darwinian theory and its ascendancy. Adds little to our knowledge, but is a fresh and stimulating account, and presents an excellent analysis of later writers, such as Gissing, Hardy, Moore, and Shaw. An interesting attempt at a primarily social approach to an understanding of the period and its literature. Not always accurate; arbitrary in emphasis.—C. F. HARROLD.

An attempt to indicate Carlyle's early relations with, and his debt to, German literature and philosophy, based upon a fresh study of the sources, in the light of all the relevant published research on Carlyle; an effort to show that Carlyle, while remaining a "Calvinist without theology," levied freely upon Kant, Goethe, Fichte, Novalis, Schiller, and other German writers for new terms and formulas. The sixth and final volume of the most exhaustive account of Carlyle's life; marred, as in the preceding volumes, by excessive championing of Carlyle against the allegations of Froude, and by an opinionated approach to the subject; containing virtually no exposition or interpretation of Carlyle's works and doctrines, or his relation to the social, economic, religious, and philosophical problems of his time; a readable compilation of anecdotes, and a factual narrative of considerable value for reference.—C. A worthy addition to the Oxford series which already includes Shakespeare's England and Johnson's England. As is inevitable in a work by many hands, the performance is uneven. Some of the seventeen chapters are deserving of particular commendation, notably "Homes and habits," "Town life and London," "The Press," "Architecture," and the editor's concluding summary, "Portrait of an age," which is the most brilliant of all. Least adequate are the chapters on art and drama, in spite of the fact that Allardyce Nicoll is the author of the latter. Limitations of space, of course, necessitate the omission of many interesting and important subjects; indeed, the editor apologizes for including nothing on law. But in a work in which a full chapter is devoted to charity, and another to holidays and travel, the failure to include any discussion of philosophy, religion, science, invention, commerce, or politics would seem rather reprehensible. These reservations granted, one must admit that the authors are successful in their attempt to furnish a "background of ideas and habits" for the understanding of early Victorian life.—FREDERIC E. FAVERTY.

An interesting study of what the Victorians read, considered from the point of view of social and intellectual groups—High Church, Dissenter, Tractarian, patron of Mudie's library, etc.—Excellent, so far as the author's materials permit; a wider, deeper, and more exact study in this field remains to be done. Not always accurate; little attempt at proportion or emphasis. A good, popular, pioneering type of study, suggestive of further possibilities in the study of Victorian reading habits.—

This handbook is one of the best in the excellent Crofts series on the English poets. Among the widely dispersed materials, the immature criticisms, and often erroneous conclusions of his predecessors in the field, DeVane threads his way with assurance and painstaking accuracy. He levies tribute upon the sounder Browning commentators, and corrects the work of the misinformed. In many cases he adds new information. The poems are discussed in "the chronological order of their publication," all discussions following the same orderly arrangement: publication, text, genesis and composition, sources and influences, after-history. The book is a valuable addition to Browning scholarship, and should provide, as the author modestly hopes it will, "a point of departure for further investigations."—FREDERIC E. FAVERTY.

Kunitz, Stanley J., and Haycraft, Howard (eds.). British authors of the nineteenth century. Complete in one volume with 1000 biographies and 350 portraits. New York: H. W. Wilson. Pp. 677.

A volume of literary biographies, written with more freshness and informality than is usual in reference books; many of the portraits are excellently printed; the bibliographies supplied are neither adequate nor discriminating nor up to date; there are a number of regrettable errors in fact and in proofreading. Though the editors assert that "current bio-critical research into nineteenth century English literary history has been consulted, and, it is hoped, assimilated," very little modern research has apparently entered into either the articles or the bibliographies, which rely, to their detriment, far too heavily on the old manuals and literary histories. An attractive and interesting book to browse in, but not a scholarly guide.—C. F. HARROLD.

A vivid panoramic account, at times epigrammatic, often fragmentary and impressionistic; stresses the twin powers, Russia and America, in the development of the century; contains stimulating passages on the Victorians, on Chartism, revolution, and other social and economic phenomena of the age. A rich and stimulating account of three or four themes in modern thought: philosophic Romanticism, from Kant through Hegel; utilitarianism; socialism; science and its challenge to philosophy. Valuable as a study in the intellectual foundations of the nineteenth century. Evolution, however, is given only one chapter, philosophic Romanticism five. But the point of view is determined by Mead's basic creed—a dynamic conception of the present as the living re-creation of all that was real in the past, pragmatically interpreted.—C. F. HARROLD.

A comprehensive and scholarly study of the Romantic cult of nature in English poetry since the seventeenth century, showing how the concept of nature "grew out of the poets' desire to associate the 'beauteous forms' of the out-of-doors world with the laws and order of the universe, reinforcing the esthetic pleasure . . . with the philosophical notion of order and unity, and vice versa, [and] assuming that the order of the universe is purposive, harmonious and . . . benevolent towards man." The concept "made possible the passage without too great emotional strain from medieval Christian faith to the scientific positivism which tends to dominate cultivated minds today." After examining the roots of the concept in such thinkers as Cudworth, More, Newton, Berkeley, and Shaftesbury, the author deals with the naturalism of Wordsworth and other Romantics and considers also the Platonism and transcendentalism in Shelley, Coleridge, Carlyle, Emerson, and Whitman. Chap. ix presents very suggestively the nature and influence of naturalism in Goethe. Part III (pp. 397-499) deals with the gradual breakup of the concept in Arnold, Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, and Meredith. In Part IV (pp. 503-59) the Romantic concept of nature is seen disappearing in Hardy and the post-Victorians and vanishing in present-day poetry, which celebrates social union rather than nature as the refuge of "orphaned and defrauded" man. There are fifty-one pages of valuable and helpful notes. The study as a whole gives more stress to the "naturalistic rather than [to] the transcendental aspect of the romantic poets," and excludes any consideration of the social and political aspects of the subject: "The most successful part of the book falls in the first two hundred pages, in the author's wide and lucid grasp of the metaphysical concept of nature and of its expression in Wordsworth. Not all readers will agree with all the statements in a work so wide in compass and so full of fact and judgment; but no student of English poetry can fail to benefit by a study of the work. It is not only an investigation of a literary attitude but is also the history of the rise and fall of "one of the bravest efforts of the human spirit."—C. F. HARROLD.

An illuminating and frequently witty defense of the Romantic point of view in literature and in life, as against some modern critics; based largely on present-day theories of the unconscious and defining Romanticism as the expression of the instinctive ego (the "id") as it weaves its dream-world in which the social taboos (the "super-ego") and the sense of fact (the "reality-principle") may be successfully flouted. Classicism, Romanticism, and realism are all discussed in relation to their relative releasing of the "preconscious and instinctive side of personality"

(pp. 31 ff.). The book is not, however, heavily laden with Freudian terms and theories but is a provocative examination of a literary ideal and method, made brilliant with quotations from foreign literatures, ancient and modern, and guided by a sane sense of values. The most successful chapters are chaps. i-iii (the Ballard Mathews Lectures for 1935); chap. iv is a most vigorous attempt to deflate Coleridge's reputation as a critic (one of the most formidable attacks on any Romantic critic); chap. v attempts to answer the modern subjective and anarchic critics by an appeal to imagination and human dignity. The book ends, rather lamely, by reprinting, as chap. vi, a paper from the Cornhill magazine, on the author's visit to Iceland and on that country's Romantic tradition. Many references to Victorian Romantics.—C. F. HARROLD.

A monument of research and exposition but not improving on Henry Festing Jones's Life; unfortunately published too soon to include the recently published letters to Miss Savage (see VB 1935, 424); the first half is devoted to an analysis of Butler's life and background, with admirable treatment of Victorian England; the second half deals with Butler's style and literary method. A weighty and exhaustive work, one of the most impressive on Butler thus far.—C. F. HARROLD.

An attack on Butler's reputation as a great man and as a great literary artist; vituperative, at times inaccurate or unfaithful to the facts; seeks to show that the world has accepted Butler at his own exaggerated evaluation and to deflate both Butler's and his biographer Jones's legend of Butler's importance in the late-Victorian advance toward emancipation. Shrewd and hard-hitting, but uncritical. —C. F. HARROLD.

A closely wrought and valuable study. The first sixty-nine pages treat of Carlyle as a writer up to Frederick. The author then carefully analyzes Carlyle's method in that work, considering Carlyle's methods with sources, with historical phenomena, with his own style, etc. There are excellent passages on phantasy; on history as anecdote (a feature of Carlyle's work influenced by Novalis but hitherto neglected by critics of Carlyle); the dramatic element in Carlyle's historiography (monologue, dialogue, lyrical characterization, etc.); his irony; his pictorial methods with Momentaufnahmen, with the Miniaturarbeit bei der Personenschilderung, and with the Kleinmaleret der Milieuschilderung; and Carlyle as a symbolist, especially in relation to Macaulay and Schiller.—C. A fascinating and valuable volume, both for its informative text and for its splendid photographs. There are unfortunately too few photographs from the 1840's and 50's; and many of those depicting stage life and people are surely below average in technique and representativeness. There are seldom-seen pictures of Lord Brougham, Gladstone, Thackeray, Eliza Cooke, Tennyson, Spurgeon, Huxley, Lord Leighton, Leech, Lord Elgin, and Palmerston. The Victorian middle-class family is caught to the life, opposite p. 44; and there is a remarkable "Jamesian" group opposite p. 97. The Victorian age is the first epoch to leave behind it its photographed history. Perhaps the charm and interest of this book will induce someone to bring out a larger and better one.—C. F. H.

III. MOVEMENTS OF IDEAS AND LITERARY FORMS; ANTHOLOGIES

Artz, Frederick B. "European civilization 1815-1850; some unfinished business." JMH, IX, 304-13

Indicates the crying need for general interpretative works on 19th-cent. German society, the Habsburg and Ottoman empires, and Spanish civilization. Deplores the lack of comprehensive works on movements in literature from 1750 to 1850 written from an international point of view. No such major work has appeared since the Main currents of George Brandes in the 1870's. The indifference of American historians to the valuable contributions to intellectual history by such historians of comparative literature as Baldensperger is pointed out. Monographic studies on a multitude of subjects are needed: studies on the press of individual countries; movements of social and political ideas across national boundaries—for example, the influence of education, technical and otherwise, almost totally ignored by the professors of education. Such general works must come from the "older practitioners of history," but the monographic studies may well be attempted by candidates for the Ph.D.—F. E. F.

One of the major scholarly works of the year; a monumental study, rich in learning, and admirable in style and method. The first five chapters deal with the Romantic period (beginning with "The eighteenth century" and bringing the discussion down to "Minor poets of the early nineteenth century," in chap. v); then there follow excellent treatments of Tennyson, Arnold, Morris, Swinburne, Browning, Meredith, and various minor poets; the last three chapters deal with poets from the 1890's to the present, English and American. The author's wide knowledge of the ancient classics imparts to his discussion of each poet such original and illuminating views that even the specialist in the poet finds new and fresh aspects of his subject. Unavoidably, in many cases the poets are seen somewhat out of focus, as the author expands upon the mythical element in their works; but in a study so laden with interesting findings, this fault—if it be one—is negligible. The study is amply documented with footnotes and chapter bibliographies and presents, in addition, an appendix listing all significant mythological poems in English since 1680. For the scholar and student in the Victorian field, Professor Bush has not only brilliantly delineated one of the major traditions of the Victorian era but has also shown one of the threads in the vital continuity between that age and the preceding one.—C. A collection of extracts from minor Victorian fiction designed to recall the "domestic scene" of the age; tending to present Victorianism under its more absurd and repellent aspects, and thus to throw the picture of the age out of focus. The introductory essay, originally published in the Home Supplement of the Times of 1935, intelligently compares the Victorian age with our own day, and makes numerous illuminating observations relative to the significance of the term "Victorian."—C. An interesting, penetrating, but disappointing book. Useful mainly for its acute and comprehensive analysis of the chief Victorian problem: the reconciliation of "culture" with (industrial) "civilization," and with science. Mill's essay On liberty is taken as marking the turning-point in the century. Thereafter the effort became feverish to vindicate human, and spiritual, values in the presence of scientific reason and the overwhelming technological changes which were altering life on all planes. The author turns a shrewdly appraising eye on all the great Victorian writers and presents the essence of their individual struggle and the significance of their failure. Now and then, unexpected light is thrown into obscure corners, and some of the lesser figures take on fresh meaning (as in the case of Froude). But as the author comes down to the Edwardian era, his analysis becomes less complete and convincing: J. S. Haldane, Jules Romains, and Thomas Mann are set up as the new guides, and the false leads of the nineteenth century are to be seen as no longer an incubus on modern man. The book succeeds better as an analysis of the Victorian spiritual struggle than as a study of man's progress toward the twentieth century. One may quarrel with the author's thesis, with his definitions, and with his prescriptions; but few will deny that he has written an intensely provocative, clarifying, and intelligent diagnosis of the Victorian age, especially as viewed in its earlier decades. With the last four chapters omitted, with a title accurately indicating the Victorian compass of the book, and with a more adequate conclusion, the work would stand out as a memorably trenchant criticism of the age of Darwin.—C. Begins with an illuminating discussion of the Icelandic sagas, and proceeds to discuss the works of Morris, the Irish literary movement (Synge, Lady Gregory, the earlier work of Yeats, James Stephens, etc.). The most important section of the book, so far as the title indicates, is the conclusion, in which it is shown that both Morris and Yeats used the sagas to express their own personalities, and thus completely transformed them into something original.—C. VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman (and editor of the bibliography), University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harold, Michigan State Normal College; Frederic E. Faverty, Northwestern University; and Charles W. Thomas, University of Wisconsin, assisted by Marjorie Hill, Rebecca Ruggles, and Viola Wendt. The editor wishes to express thanks to Carl J. Weber, Colby College, for his annual and voluntary aid with the Hardy items. This bibliography attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1938 (including reviews of earlier items) which have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1938. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1937, in Modern philology, May, 1938, is made by the following form: See VB 1937, 437. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible.

"Attempts to list the most significant books and articles of 1937 which deal with Anglo-French and Franco-American literary history, from the sixteenth century to the present." Intended as the first in a series of annual bibliographies, this establishes itself in a field dealt with too cursorily in other surveys. By limiting itself in the main to a brief indication of the contents of book or article, it steers a middle course between being on the one hand a mere list and on the other a series of reviews by one critic, the Scylla and Charybdis that cause grief for many bibliographies.—F. The third and final volume of this very valuable work, bringing the narrative down from the Queen's first Jubilee to the outbreak of the World War, and covering such reforms as old age pensions, health insurance, town planning, etc.; set forth with the author's usual literary force and clarity, and handled so expertly that his weighty factual account never becomes a mere catalogue, but remains an absorbing narrative of late-Victorian economic evolution.—C. This is the sequel to Mr. Maccoby's English radicalism: 1832-1852, and shows the same merits and defects: a brilliant use of primary sources hitherto neglected, and a failure to make his multitudinous details synthesize in illuminating conclusions. There is the same revealing emphasis on the role played by Radical societies for agitation, contemporary documents, and obscure Radical periodicals. The author is undoubtedly guilty of undue stress on the power of the Radical forces in Parliament, and he fails to take account of the unpopularity of Joseph Chamberlain not only with many Liberals but also with a great number of Radicals. On the whole, however, this volume, like its predecessor, is an invaluable source, or collection of sources, on the great Radical movement of the Victorian era.—C. F. H.

An admirable anthology. In range of content, judgment in selection of representative materials, bibliographical apparatus, and biographical, critical, and explanatory notes, it challenges comparison with any other text in its field. Its footnote annotations are remarkably complete. Arnold, Carlyle, Froude, Huxley, Macaulay, Mill, Morris, Newman, Pater, Ruskin, Alexander Smith, Stevenson, and Thackeray are the authors represented. Particular mention should be made of the introduction, which gives a full, clear, and stimulating account of the "major aspects of the Victorian period." As an added attraction, the volume includes a selected bibliography of the Victorian era, and—a new and commendable departure in such texts—an appendix "illustrative of nineteenth-century conceptions of growth, development, evolution." This last is made up of passages from Lyell, Robert Chambers, Newman, Marx and Engels, Darwin, Spencer, and Bagehot. With an attractive and durable binding, good paper, large pages, wide margins, and very readable type, the Oxford Press has done justice to this excellent work.—F. E. F.

An able and illuminating study of six critics; attempts "to present, to explain, and to evaluate the intellectual protest made against democracy in England in the nineteenth century" (p. vii); considers not only the writers' criticism of democracy but also their characteristics as writers, the influences which helped shape their thought, their basic assumptions, etc.; excels in analysis of their criticism and in forthright and thoughtful evaluation of it both in Victorian and post-Victorian terms; is weak and sketchy on much of the background, frequently through ambiguous or superficial phrasing (e.g., Carlyle's "championing of the spiritual view of life as against materialism . . . met with little success," "the anti-democratic and authoritarian ideas of the intellectuals failed to make any impression on their age" [italics added]); in spite of occasional ingenuousness of ground, a very useful survey of material helpful to scholars and students in Victorian literature presented by a professor of political science.—C. Records of Jamaica are used illuminatingly to explain much of the behavior of Edward Moulton Barrett, father of E. B. B., and that of the poetess herself. Much of R. B.'s own family background is discussed. In spite of certain weaknesses, here is a book that must be read and that will be enjoyed by all students and lovers of the Brownings.—W. D. T.

This is a continuation and conclusion of Dr. Taylor's earlier study of Carlyle: sa première fortune littéraire en France (Paris: Champion, 1929), which brought the account down to 1865, including the work of Taine. It presents anew, however, five of the earlier chapters, and is thus a remarkably comprehensive study. The influence of no other Victorian has been so exhaustively traced. The author tracks down what seem to be all the significant evidences of Carlyle's influence in France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Rumania, from 1825 to 1934. Translation of Carlyle—especially of The French Revolution in France and of the Heroes in Italy—his reception in the periodicals, the editing and criticizing of his works, the Latin interest in the Froude-Carlyle controversy, and the exploitation of Carlyle's herodotism by Italian Fascism—all make up an impressive and informative study. In addition there are several curious instances of Carlyle's influence in unlikely places, in Léon Bloy, Verhaeren, Remy de Gourmont, Barrès, and in such Spanish writers as Unamuno, Baroja, and Ortega y Gasset. Perhaps the most memorable of all is the influence of The French Revolution on Carducci, to be seen in his sonnet sequence Ca ira. Curiously absent is any treatment of the Saint-Simonians, worthy surely to be introduced along with the other earlier material. Only occasionally does the author over-work his instinct for sources and influences, as, for example, in his discussion of the far-fetched possibility of an influence of Machiavelli on Carlyle (p. 14). The chapter on the era of dictators shows to what extent Carlyle's teachings about the "hero" have been appropriated for the exaltation of Mussolini.—C. F. H.

An absorbing and brilliant re-creation not only of Fanny Kemble but also of her background—a microcosm of the Victorian age. Well written and remarkably accurate. Though not a scholarly work in the technical sense, the book should rank high among studies of life in the Victorian theater, especially as viewed through the eyes and the colorful adventures of one of its most vivid figures.—C. This is the first scholarly study of any considerable dimensions devoted to Newman as a man of letters. It includes not only a penetrating and informed treatment of Newman's literary method but also a discussion of Newman's character and mind, his native gifts, and the sources and background of his intellectual and artistic activities, in the English eighteenth century and in the Alexandrian Fathers. There are excellent chapters on Newman's style, his conception of history, his sensitivity, his literary criticism, his poetry. But there is a surprising omission of any extended consideration of the Apologia or of the Grammar of assent or of the essay on The development of Christian doctrine, all of which rank high in literary art, in spite of the comparative neglect of the last two works. The author is not wholly happy in her treatment of Newman's eloquence and of his style: the various types of eloquence he displayed in his development as a preacher are not fully indicated; and some of the more elusive qualities of Newman's style have escaped her, as is to be noted, for example, when she attempts to cite passages illustrating Newman's gift for gnomic and epigrammatic utterance. Nevertheless this thoroughgoing and careful work, amounting to four hundred and forty-four pages, is a splendid contribution to a subject which has had all too little attention from scholars: the literary artist behind the theologian in John Henry Newman.—C. This handsome and monumental work prints all of the important or interesting passages from Robinson's diary and journal which relate to his reading and his literary friendships and encounters, from the last years of the eighteenth century to the 1860's. Of great value is the magnificent index in the third volume, a boon to all scholars in the Romantics and the Victorians. Perhaps more footnote helps might have been supplied, but on this there is room for much difference of opinion: all obscure references are adequately taken care of. For comprehensiveness, usefulness, and accuracy, this work ranks high in the year's publications.—C. F. H.

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman (and editor of the bibliography), University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harold, Michigan State Normal College; Frederic E. Faverty, Northwestern University; and Samuel P. Chew, University of Wisconsin, assisted by Leslie Rutledge. The editor wishes to express thanks to Carl J. Weber, Colby College, for his annual and voluntary aid with the Hardy items. This bibliography attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1939 (including reviews of earlier items) which have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1939. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1938, in Modern philology, May, 1939, is made by the following form: See VB 1938, 423. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible.

Besterman, Theodore. A world bibliography of bibliographies. Vol. I, A-L. Oxford and London: the author; New York: H. W. Wilson. Pp. xxiv+587.

An indispensable work. It is a subject bibliography of printed bibliographies—books that give a "list of books arranged according to some permanent principle."

It includes "bibliographies of books, pamphlets, broadsides, periodicals, and, indeed, of every kind of type-set matter, together, by an extension, with systematic lists of music, maps, plans, and the like"; also bibliographies of every sort of written matter, including letters, documents, deeds, and papers of that order, as well as the more substantial type of manuscript material"; "collections of abstracts"; and indexes of patents for inventions. It attempts to represent all subjects, including scientific and technological ones, with equal completeness. Within certain specified limits, this work "aims at completeness and internationality, excluding only lists in, though not those on, Oriental languages." A peculiarly valuable characteristic is the appearance in square brackets, at the end of each entry, of the approximate number of items in that bibliography. This work, evidenced by Vol. I, is the most comprehensive work of its sort ever undertaken.—W. D. T.

Partington, Wilfred. Forging ahead. The true story of the upward progress of Thomas James Wise, prince of book collectors, bibliographer extraordinary and otherwise. New York: Putnam. Pp. xv+315.

Fascinating biography of "the secret emperor of book forgers," written by a professional author and editor who had dealings with him in person and corresponded with him from 1919 to his death in 1938. Many letters and conversations of various people are quoted. Much of this book depends on the sensational findings of Carter and Pollard (see VB 1934, 398); but this goes further than they. It gives "fresh information and . . . new and unpublished evidence of Wise's responsibility for the forgeries," and undertakes "to trace the curious and little-known ramifications of his career, to show the inner character of the man in relation to his work and ambitions, and generally to indicate the extent and value of his achievements" (p. 6). He was a successful racketeer, who at the same time was a great bibliographer and the collector of the books and MSS in his great Ashley Library, recently purchased by the British Museum. The book is crammed with details of books and literary men (the Brownings, Shelley, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Ruskin, Morris, Swinburne, Arnold, Byron, Keats, Conrad, Hardy, Borrow, Tennyson, Eliot, Shorter, Forman, etc.). A bibliography of Wise's publications, including his forgeries and piracies, appears on pp. 285-304; the index covers pp. 305-15. Clear, interesting, and at times racy, this is the "success" story of an unprincipled genius and also a carefully written book, valuable for the student and scholar of literature.—W. D. T.

A good example of how the study of Victorian publishers may throw light on the books and authors of their time; concerned with Moxon's publishing ventures, mainly in poetry, between 1830 and 1858; rests on many hitherto unpublished letters, agreements, and other MSS; gives many valuable glimpses into Tennyson's methods with MSS and proofs; and presents much on such Victorians as Talfourd, Henry Taylor, Sheridan Knowles, the Brownings.—C. A survey of popular literature, 1887-1914, seeking to show the struggle of literature with current Respectability; deals with Stevenson, G. Moore, Henley, Lang, Whibley, LeGallienne; is uneven in merit and distorts the decades it treats yet suggests by its very defects the general lines that might be taken by a study that would apply a sane and scholarly method to an important aspect of late-Victorian letters—C. A Marxist analysis of Morris, Hardy, Butler, Gissing, Wilde, Kipling; rapid, journalistic, frankly eclectic, ignoring those elements in late-Victorian literature that do not further the main thesis; begins with a 68-page survey of the "Victorian flood and ebb," which puts together rapidly materials accessible in literary manuals and textbooks, often marred by loose or dubious phrasing (e.g., "Arnold . . . came to hope that even a brutalized working class might do what a vulgarized middle class would not do [p. 55]); presents point of view throughout that self-destructing middle-class capitalism accounts for the qualities in late-Victorian literature.—C. Confused, erratic, and incomplete; deals only with the years between 1840 and 1880; abounds in errors and opinionated conclusions; extends its scope too wide for satisfactory treatment within its limits—devoting three chapters to French and Italian writers, and five to social history in America.—C. - Not a biography, but a critical narrative of the development of Arnold's mind; admirable in setting forth Arnold's emotional and intellectual tensions; brilliant in its placing of Arnold not only in his own time but in the complex pattern of modern thought since Descartes; contains fresh and penetrating criticisms of Arnold's works, relating them pertinently to the past and the present; limits itself to Arnold's ideas—especially their complex unity—and thus tends to distort our picture of him by leaving out of account the indefinable quality of his thought and feeling which made him a poet as well as a critic.—C. Professor Wilson seems curiously unaware of recent scholarship on Wordsworth and of the absence of any need to champion Stephen against Arnold's rejection of Wordsworth the "thinker." His little book is pleasant reading but not very original to those who have followed Wordsworth's reputation among the critics and scholars of the last forty years.—C. F. H.

An admirably written critical biography, supplying new material from the late Mrs. Russell Barrington, Bagehot's sister-in-law and biographer; inadequate on Bagehot's early life and on his career as banker, journalist, and talker; strong on Bagehot's literary and intellectual nature; contains six chapters devoted to his theory and practice as a writer; brief but illuminating accounts of Bagehot's religious, political, and economic convictions; all from the point of view of Neo-Humanism, according to which Bagehot is no doubt credited with more Aristotelianism than he would have acknowledged and because of which the author has written a few pages on Wordsworth (pp. 160-63) which many readers will regard as highly uncritical; on the whole, a work notable not only for its scholarship but also for its courageous and skilful passages of criticism.—C. Skilful "fictionizing" of the materials of Jane Carlyle's biography; sound in facts and creative in coloring and emphasis; curiously neglects the Carlyles' courtship and on the whole presents a pretty rather than a strong and vital picture of their relationship; interesting and successful maintenance of Jane Carlyle's point of view throughout.—C. An able analysis of Carlyle's theory and practice as historian; based chiefly, it would seem, on The French Revolution and thus arriving at conclusions which might have been different had the Cromwell and the Frederick been thoroughly examined; excellent on some of Carlyle's sources, especially Herder, Burke, and Schiller, less successful in the treatment of Coleridge and Scott; highly illuminating on Carlyle's conceptions of revolution, "social organism," history as "social biography," and on Carlyle's methods of composition; final chapter a too superficial statement of Carlyle's relationship to other historians, past and present, at least if we are to take seriously the author's avowed twofold aim, both the analysis of Carlyle's methods and his place among the great historians.—C. A highly readable and authentic one-volume biography; makes use of Macaulay's eleven-volume MS Journal in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge; yet, aside from a half-dozen amusing anecdotes, does not add materially to our knowledge of Macaulay; limited mainly to biographical narrative; superficial in critical comment on the Essays, somewhat more penetrating in dealing with the History, though unfortunately completed before Firth's Commentary on Macaulay's History of England (1938); adequately though carelessly documented in footnotes; without bibliography, a "Bibliographical Note" stating that the author saw "little reason . . . for troubling the student with a suggestion of my general reading"; a biography designed, therefore, for the general reader and, as such, an attractive and dependable work, but one that still leaves unbridged the gap between Trevelyan's Life and our need of a full, critical "life and times" of Macaulay.—C. Attempts to show, at least in its avowed aim, that Wordsworth in old age was less conservative than is generally believed; fails to prove this thesis or even to dwell upon it; concentrates on the day-by-day life at Rydal Mount when the poet had become a Victorian; in no sense competes with Miss Batho's The later Wordsworth.—C. VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

—for 1940

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harrold, Michigan State Normal College; Frederic E. Faverty, Northwestern University; and Samuel P. Chew, University of Oklahoma. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1940 (including reviews of earlier items) that have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period and similar publications of earlier date that have been inadvertently omitted from the preceding Victorian bibliography. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1940. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1939, in Modern philology, May, 1940, is made by the following form: See VB 1939, 412. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible.

The Cambridge bibliography of English literature. Ed. by F. W. Bateson. 4 vols. Cambridge univ. pr. Pp. xl+912; xx+1003; xxii+1098; 287.

The third volume, dealing with the nineteenth century, is naturally of greatest value for scholars of the Victorian period; but all volumes are of value—the fourth, the index volume, included. Vol. III is arranged in seven parts, as follows: (1) Introduction, (2) The poetry, (3) Prose fiction, (4) The drama, (5) Critical and miscellaneous prose, (6) Philosophy, history, science, and other forms of learning, (7) The literature of the Dominions. These seven parts are divided—for instance, the introduction has these divisions: (I) Bibliographies, literary histories and special studies, prose selections, and literary memoirs and reminiscences; (II) Literary relations with the Continent; (III) The intellectual background; (IV) Book production and distribution; (V) Education; and (VI) The political and social background. Then there are subdivisions and further subdivisions.

Little more can be given here than a word of high praise, and of general explanation. Mr. Bateson has labored long, conscientiously, with tremendous energy and pains, and with most valuable effectiveness. For many, many years to come the scholars in the great field of English literature will inevitably be indebted to him and, of course, to the Cambridge University Press. This CBEL is a descendant of The Cambridge history of English literature (1907-16) and the bibliographies appended to its chapters. But the CBEL has "its own arrangement, scope, and style, and its own army of contributors." It is not a modern edition of the CHEL bibliographies, but is a modern equivalent of them, and more. Using a chronological order as far as possible, it purports to record the authors, titles, and editions, and the relevant criticism, of all the books (in English or Latin) that can be said still to have literary interest and that were published by writers native to what is now the British Empire and who were "established" by 1900. Because of the chronological order, there is basis for Mr. Bateson's contention that it is "something more than a catalogue"; that "it is, in addition, a short-hand history of English literature"; and that, "used with discretion, some of the sections will tell the diligent enquirer more about their subject-matter than does the ordinary textbook." As pointed out in the preface, the different forms and subjects have been treated in varying degrees of detail. The chief objections to the CBEL will be that some relatively minor authors have not been included at all and, especially, that some minor authors, though provided with partial lists of their works, have not been provided with lists of biographical and critical works about them. The lists of secondary publications ("Biography and criticism" and "Modern studies") that have been given are necessarily selective, but the editor has tried to include every important work of criticism or exposition, at least to the end of 1935 or 1936 for Vol. I, 1937 for Vol. II, and 1938 for Vol. III.—W. Traces the evils of today's social order (culminating in war) to the triumph of utilitarian laissez faire in mid-Victorian England; analyzes the social, cultural, and moral results of the Peelite split in the Tory party in 1846; and attempts to show that a hopeful outlook is still to be found in the "organic Toryism" preached by Disraeli, plus a moral socialism such as is im-

- plight in the teachings of Morris. A stimulating book, with much of which many readers will not agree, but which vitalizes a good deal of mid-Victorian political economy by showing how relevant it is to the present-day dilemma.—C. F. H.

Dedicated to the thesis that the classic versus romantic conflict is fundamentally an unsound English controversy; that the genius of English poetry has never truly ceased to be "romantic," a term which applies to all that is basic in the great English poetic tradition. Will arouse much disagreement among all types of readers, who will compare it, unfavorably, with Lucas' Decline and fall of the romantic ideal. A provocative and stimulating study.—C. F. H.

A well-documented article, with treatment especially of Darwin, but also of Huxley, Spencer, Morley, Lyell, E. B. Tyler, McLennan, Alfred R. Wallace, James Hunt, Bagehot, John Lubbock, Francis Galton, W. R. Greg, and others. The article concludes that Darwin's discussion of the moral faculty of man is a summing-up, from the point of view of the evolution of man, of the ideas presented by others during the 1860's; that Darwin contributed two important details, in addition to gathering and shaping the ideas of others into a coherent theory of the origin, nature, and development of man's moral being; that The descent of man (1871) inaugurated the controversial stage in the development of evolutionary ethics—the second rather than the first stage. Neff, Emery. A revolution in European poetry, 1600-1900. New York: Columbia univ. pr. Pp. x+279.

This is an admirable, relatively brief, historical study in comparative literature, tracing the main themes of European literature—the literature of France, England, Germany, and Italy—from the culmination of mid-seventeenth-century French “classicism” through the phenomena of “romanticism” (though these Protean terms are never used) down to the last emancipations from the era of Louis XIV in the works of Jules Laforgue and Mallarmé. A surprising amount of literary history is compressed within the 279 pages of Professor Neff’s volume; yet all is handled with clarity and with distinction of style. It will be of great help to students in bringing Continental movements of thought and literature into revealing relationship with those in England, in showing the underlying unity of Western culture and change during a period when a great revolution, too broad and complicated to be snared in a simple definition, shifted the intellectual center of gravity from the world of Racine, Newton, and Gottsched to that of Goethe, Wordsworth, and Hugo. In a work which attempts not only to synthesize so many great literary forces but also to deal with them in a spirit of criticism, readers will sometimes find themselves in conflict with the author’s judgments, emphases, details, or principle of selection. Yet, in these days of quantitative and uncritical accumulation of fact, it is refreshing to come upon a book which has the courage to assemble and evaluate. For Victorianists, the book presents a brief and vivid background in Continental literature and a number of arresting passages on such Victorians as Tennyson, Arnold, Browning, Swinburne.—C. F. H.

- This commentary treats every poem in respect to sources, influences, dates, and significance in Arnold's development, in so far as all known materials are available; it levies upon the "Yale Manuscript," a volume of some seventy pages of notes and rough drafts of poems, and upon Arnold's letters, journals, and other sources, in an attempt to solve the problems arising from Arnold's habit of "incessantly classifying and rearranging his verses, cancelling and restoring poems, excerpting passages that might stand alone, revising the diction, and altering the punctuation." Much valuable light is thrown on the meaning of a number of poems and passages, though the editors admit that "disappointingly little has been discovered as to the exact date of composition" of many of them. Much is revealed as to Arnold's methods of writing, his debt to rather unlikely sources, such as periodical reviews and other journalistic and "literary" sources, and the causes of his occasional blunders and inconsistencies. Many of the major poems—"Dover Beach," "Obermann once more," and "Tristram and Iseult"—are thus given a new and illuminating approach, though many readers will feel that, in view of the new materials drawn upon, more interpretation might have been expected. Many will regret, too, that the editors denied themselves the opportunity to present a cogent discussion of Arnold's poetry and poetic development in the Introduction. They will, however, appreciate Sir Francis Wylie's appendix-chapter on "The scholar-gipsy country." A companion volume, containing the poems themselves, has been planned for publication in 1941, the two volumes to constitute a new edition of the complete Poetical works. No thoughtful reader of Arnold can afford to neglect the thorough, accurate, and well-organized product of Professors Tinker and Lowry.—C. F. H.

This work, together with George Eliot's letters (now in the Yale University Library) at present being edited by Mr. Haight, will revolutionize much in our conception of Marian Evans; it supplies much that was omitted by John W. Cross, and publishes Chapman's hitherto unpublished diaries, also in the possession of Yale University; it portrays George Eliot as more dependent on others than is generally supposed, and reveals Chapman as a puzzlingly contradictory character; the Westminster review group, including Herbert Spencer, receives new and illuminating treatment.—C. The southern review: Thomas Hardy centennial issue (Vol. VI, No. 1).

Its articles are listed in the present Hardy bibliog. according to authors' names; this issue of the Southern review is a good-sized book.

In this brilliant and provocative volume Hardy faces a barrage of critical artillery, and he emerges from the ordeal rather well. Many of his poems, it is true, are summarily discarded; he is repeatedly belabored for his "ill-digested philosophy" (Tate); and his novels undergo searching analysis which is not always favorable. But though much is taken, much abides. Although he is not a major poet, he wrote "major poems" (Leavis), is "a great minor poet" (Ransom), and his works are distinguished by "the best sort of humanity" (Baker), and by a fine "sense of the dignity of man" (Dobrée). These essays go beyond their assignment. They contain also much illuminating comment on nineteenth-century thought and on Victorian and modern poets and poetry.—S. P. C.

This biography is primarily and avowedly written to show Hardy as a man of letters—"to tell why Thomas Hardy wrote, why he wrote on the subjects he chose, and how his books grew from ideas and emotions and experiences to printed volumes." Mr. Weber has succeeded remarkably well, as was expected of him. He has for years made himself internationally acknowledged, because of his numerous articles and monographs, as a vigorous, intelligent, meticulous, and appreciative Hardy scholar. His book is a centennial tribute to Hardy and is such a work as we think Hardy himself would approve of. He has achieved a mastery of an immense amount of fact, including much drawn from hundreds of unpublished letters; and he has made fact interesting, as he uses it shrewdly, straightforwardly, and economically to show us Hardy the writer and to give us a new and better understanding and, consequently, a more appreciative enjoyment of Hardy's prose and poetry. Inevitably there must emerge (and does emerge) from such a presentation a better understanding of and a new admiration for Hardy the man.

Because of the interest that wartime England and America today are showing in The dynasts, many people would welcome from Mr. Weber a larger treatment of that poem than he has seen fit to give of it in a brief chapter of this book. He has, however, intentionally restricted himself in this book and has striven toward objectivity of treatment. Those who wish that he had included more interpretation should not criticize this book adversely for lacking it.

The style of the book is simple, clear, unaffected, meaty, and sympathetic. Mr. Weber writes as only one can write who has written much and who has gained control of a vastly greater amount of detail about his subject than he sees fit to use for his set purpose. Previous reviewers have properly praised him especially for his tactful yet effective dealing with all that pertains to the first Mrs. Hardy. Chapter iv ("The poor man and the critic") is also particularly well done. The literary biography of Hardy covers pp. 3-231. Appendixes cover pp. 235-78 and present much helpful and much new information, including, with others, sections on Hardy's quotations from English literature, his debt to Shakespeare, notes on the Wessex novels, Hardy's short stories, his debt to Browning, his Napoleonic library, the Hardy plays, and Hardy's manuscripts. The fact that the index covers twenty-two pages of double-columned small type indicates that Mr. Weber has skilfully compressed a very large amount of objective detail into a smoothly coherent and richly rewarding book.—W. A work of very uneven merit; attempting to cover the numerous activities of Morris, it is best when dealing with his work as a socialist and with his effort to bring art into everyday life; inadequate and often misleading on Morris' ideas; aims to be readable and fails to be substantial; does not support its commercializing title; leaves a much-needed one-volume "life and work" still to be written.—C. Tennyson (see also II, Abercrombie; III, Lucas; Carlyle: Davis). Selections from Tennyson. Ed. with introd. by William Clyde DeVane and Mabel Phillips DeVane. New York: Crofts. Pp. xxv+481.

Attempts to put "all the best of Tennyson's poetry into the compass of one readable volume, sufficiently annotated and edited to be useful to the students." The poems are arranged according to time of first publication. An appendix gives the form of the first published versions of "The lady of Shalott," "Oenone," and "The lotus-eaters." A selected bibliography is added (pp. 478-81). The notes are unusually numerous and are carefully concise in expression, even though some few are appropriately long; they will undoubtedly aid the student. The introduction (pp. xi-xxiii) presents a well-considered evaluation and appreciation of Tennyson's work and reputation. Although some readers may think the appreciation too conservative, others will not; and the characterization of the man and of his work is refreshing and appealing as it portrays the contradictions in his nature, his ambitions, and his poetry. In spite of small type the book is easy to read and is well made.—W. D. T.

VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harrold, Michigan State Normal College; Samuel P. Chew, University of Oklahoma; and Austin Wright, Carnegie Institute of Technology. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1941 (including reviews of earlier items) that have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period and similar publications of earlier date that have been inadvertently omitted from the preceding Victorian bibliography. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1941. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1940, in Modern philology, May, 1941, is made by the following form: See VB 1940, 443. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible.

Bevington, Merle Mowbray. The Saturday review, 1855-1868: representative educated opinion in Victorian England. ("Columbia university studies in English and comparative literature," No. 154.) New York: Columbia univ. pr. Pp. x+415.

Uses a famous and important weekly newspaper as a source and a subject for literary and intellectual history. The book deals chiefly with the years 1855-68, the period of its first editor, John Douglas Cook. The author's reasons are that selection and adequate consideration within a single volume could not be given for a longer period and, especially, that "by 1868 the Saturday review had attained its distinctive form and its maximum influence"—from then on its course is one of continuation and decline. The last chapter rapidly traces the magazine through the years until it ceased publication, in 1938. Mr. Bevington considers in this book the writers in the Saturday review as commentators on and critics of English civilization. His chapters deal with (1) the circumstances of periodical publications, especially the daily and weekly papers, (2) politics, (3) religion, (4) morals and society, (5) the prophets, (6) novels and light literature, (7) poetry, (8) general literature, (9) foreign literature, (10) science, (11) the arts. An appendix on pp. 331-91 presents an account of writers for the Saturday review and their contributions; an account is also given of writers for the Review to whom Mr. Bevington can make no definite ascriptions. The names appear, in the appendix, of James Fitzjames Stephen, Bagehot, Brodrick, George Butler, R. W. Church, George Eliot, E. A. Freeman, Froude, Galton, Garnett, Grant Duff, J. R. Green, Huxley, Kingsley, Lewes, Linton, Morley, Palgrave, Patmore, Sandars, Leslie Stephen, Venables, etc. A great number of notable Victorians are treated in the book. The bibliography and the index cover pp. 393-415.

An important presentation of mid-Victorian life, well documented, and written with a cool breadth of view, yet with a lively and sincere interest. Literature receives the fullest consideration, and students of the Victorian period in European letters, especially English, will find this book valuable. The Saturday review is representative of the intellects, activities, and standards of those who were mostly well-to-do; representative of a minority, but nevertheless representative of an extremely important city class—that class in the English population that, as the Saturday review itself states, "fairly represents the wealth, the education, and the governing power concentrated in the metropolis." Mr.

Bevington has done excellently well in writing a history of 1855-68, as that fascinating period is indicated through the pages of a great and powerful weekly review.—W. D. T.

Many details of Victorian living conditions—industrial, political, and domestic—are indicated in this history of a great printing firm. Many reprints of old illustrations are given. There are references to various magazines that this firm printed and to Victorian newspapers. The accounts of magazine production (the British workman, the Animal world, the Family mirror, the Illustrated photographer, etc.) are particularly interesting. Mention is made of various authors: Dickens, Gladstone, Edwin P. Hood, Besant, Ruskin, Sir W. R. Nicoll, J. M. Barrie, John Watson ("Ian Maclaren"), Martin Tupper, Miss Burdett-Coutts, Sala, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Bulwer-Lytton, etc. One chapter is devoted to "What our grandparents used to read." Letters from Ruskin to Henry Jowett, manager of Hazell's, are printed and discussed on pp. 98-105. Hazell's have a collection of "seventy-two out of the hundreds of letters that Ruskin wrote to Henry Jowett in the Seventies and Eighties." This printing-history will please and inform the student of the Victorian era. An index would have been an improvement.—W. D. T.

An indispensable, highly illuminating book for Brontë students and scholars; also valuable and fascinating for the general reader who may have no particular Brontë interest. Miss Ratchford has done a remarkably good job of summarizing and discussing and correlating a vast amount of widely scattered and difficult-to-read manuscript material and of showing in a clear and interesting manner the psychological and literary importance of it all.—W. Tennyson (see also III, A book of short plays; III, Hull). Tennyson: representative poems. Selected and ed. by Samuel C. Chew. ("Odyssey series in literature.") New York: Odyssey pr. Pp. lvi+520.

The introduction (pp. xi-xlii) presents chronologically arranged statements of fact, interpretation, and criticism of Tennyson's poetry; is biographical "only so far as a record of Tennyson's life serves to explain his growth as a poet." Mr. Chew has provided an excellent selected bibliography on pp. xlii-lvi, with useful critical comments. The poems that constitute the main part of this book are put into eight groups: I. "The poet and his land"; II. "Songs"; III. "The poet and his art"; IV. "Poems on classical subjects"; V. "Poems on medieval subjects"; VI. "'Maud' and miscellaneous poems"; VII. "'In memoriam' and other elegies"; VIII. "Personal and meditative poems." This grouping is highly arbitrary. It tends, moreover, to convey an impression of periodicity of separate interests. Such an impression is unfortunate; the continuity and overlapping of Tennyson's interests ought not to be put into a shadow. The editor's footnote annotations are good. But in selection and arrangement and annotation of poems this book does not supersede the DeVanes' Selections from Tennyson. There is valuable inclusion, in the three appendixes of this book, of juvenilia, poems of literary squabbles, and poems by Alfred's brothers, Frederick and Charles.—W. D. T.

VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harold, Michigan State Normal College; Samuel P. Chew, University of Oklahoma; and Austin Wright, Carnegie Institute of Technology. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1942 (including reviews of earlier items) that have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period and similar publications of earlier date that have been inadvertently omitted from the preceding Victorian bibliography. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1942. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1941, in Modern philology, May, 1942, is made by the following form: See VB 1941, 411. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible. For certain continuing bibliographical works, and for most of the abbreviations used, see the preceding Victorian bibliographies.

In the preface to Mr. Weber's Hardy of Wessex: his life and literary career, published in 1940, the author called Hardy "the most voluminously discussed writer of modern times." This book is a supplement to Hardy of Wessex. It presents a list of works consulted by Mr. Weber for his writing of the biography. Such a list was too long to be given as an appendix, printed and bound with the biography. But the book presents also the titles of works written in foreign languages about Hardy—including Swedish, Russian, Italian, Polish, Chinese, Japanese. Finally, it attempts to incorporate in its listings a record of "everything that had ever been written about Hardy anywhere during his first hundred years." In order that the many writings called forth by the centenary of Hardy's birth could be listed in this centenary volume, it was not sent to press until the end of 1941; numerous memorial articles did not appear until during 1941.

This bibliography has omitted mention, I believe, of no important items about Hardy. I believe, further, that an exceedingly small number of Hardiana of even slight value have been left out of its lists. Every person, scholar or not, who has enjoyed reading Hardy's work and who looks at this book will be pleased to see it, for a lover of work by a certain author likes to learn that many other readers share his enthusiasm. He will be grateful to Mr. Weber for thus indicating the remarkable popularity of Hardy—remarkable in its variety, its pervasiveness, and its persistence.—W. D. T.

Tupper. Buchmann, Ralf. Martin F. Tupper and the Victorian middle class mind. ("Schweizer anglistische Arbeiten," No. 10.) Bern: A. Francke AG., 1941. Pp. 165.

Rev. by M. Thrall in MLN, LVII, 677-79.

Mr. Buchmann investigates the following sorts of Victorian middle-class ideas and ideals: those dealing with faith in the Bible, the Anglican Revival, science, morality, the Christian gentleman, home life, education, money, success, utility, progress, optimism, social sentimentalism, the political compromise, and patriotism. He centers his study of these in statements by Tupper. Although he points out some things of interest and value, I quote one sentence as a warning of what the reader must be on guard against: "He [Tupper] 'outbrowns' Browning's 'God's in His Heaven, all's right with the world,' in his Ballad of 'Optimism.'"

At one place Buchmann states that his purpose has been to illustrate a class by specifying an individual (Tupper) and by comparing his ideas and ideals with those of other middle-class individuals. He is making, says he, "a purely historical survey of Victorian middle class literature, life, and thought." Elsewhere, however, he gives a different indication of his purpose, stating his belief that a close study of the Victorian bourgeoisie will make their defects odious to the present, will help us to free ourselves from these "fetters of a narrow-minded bourgeois Weltanschauung." But to be successful, says he, his work must be "strictly critical," must "relentlessly satirize," must be "purely critical and destructive." He insists that we "must destroy the conventional, the smug, the commonplace, that which found its outlet in Tupper's works as the opinion of a wide public"—must destroy them because we have inherited them from the Victorians, and them "we have to destroy and kill even in ourselves." But in the next paragraph he declares that we have inherited good as well as bad. Then, in the second paragraph farther along, he concludes as follows: "The Victorian middle class mind deserves severe criticism to destroy the barriers of self-assurance and conceit built up around its weak core." This reviewer finds a confusion of intentions, and a loose, hazy, and badly labored apologia.

A considerable weakness in this study is that it does not give Tupper credit, as Thomas Seacombe did, for certain good ideas and actions; and that it also fails to give the Victorian middle-class mind similar credit—credit that it deserved probably to a greater degree than did Tupper.—W. D. T.

Southern review: the William Butler Yeats memorial issue, Vol. VII, No. 3. Pp. 260.

Rev. in CE, III, 601-2. Contains 15 articles: Howard Baker, "Domes of Byzantium"; R. P. Blackmur, "Between myth and philosophy: fragments of W. B. Yeats"; Kenneth Burke, "On motivation in Yeats"; Donald Davidson, "Yeats and the centaur"; T. S. Eliot, "The poetry of W. B. Yeats"; Horace Gregory, "W. B. Matthiessen, "The crooked road"; Arthur Mizener, "The romanticism of W. B. Yeats"; John Crowe Ransom, "The Irish, the Gaelic, the Byzantine"; Delmore Schwartz, "An unwritten book"; Allen Tate, "Yeats's romanticism: notes and suggestions"; Austin Warren, "Religio poetarum"; Morton D. Zabel, "The thinking of the body: Yeats in the autobiographies."

This Yeats memorial issue is even better than the Hardy volume (see VB 1940, 452), possibly because Yeats's poetry offers more of a challenge than does Hardy's. The fifteen distinguished authors of this symposium have written with the scholarship and fine critical insight which has always characterized the Southern review, and the result is the most impressive volume of criticism which has yet appeared about a poet of this century.

We have here brilliant studies of various aspects of Yeats's work, but some of the more baffling problems are left unsolved. There is no agreement upon the matter of the romanticism of the later Yeats, and even on the question of evaluation there is wide difference of opinion. To Eliot, Yeats is the greatest of modern poets; to Blackmur he is the greatest English poet since the seventeenth century; but by others he is weighed and found wanting.

The student of Victorian literature may perhaps find fault with the volume in that the critical bias of certain of the authors results in a contemptuous treatment of the early "romantic" Yeats. He is studied as a rare example of a romantic poet who grew up, gained wisdom. Now the peculiar significance of the later poetry will be admitted by all, but it is at least doubtful that posterity will dismiss the earlier Yeats, along with the other Pre-Raphaelite poets, as unworthy of serious notice. The task of the critic is to educate the taste to the poetry of the past, not to break the poetry of the past on the Procrustean bed of the taste of the present.—S. P. C.

VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harold, Ohio State University; Samuel P. Chew, University of Oklahoma; and Austin Wright, Carnegie Institute of Technology. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1943 (including reviews of earlier items) that have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period and similar publications of earlier date that have been inadvertently omitted from the preceding Victorian bibliography. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1943. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1942, in Modern philology, May, 1943, is made by the following form: See VB 1942, 337. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible. For certain continuing bibliographical works, and for most of the abbreviations used, see the preceding Victorian bibliographies.

Scholars will still use union card catalogs that include Library of Congress cards; but they will find this series of volumes exceedingly useful.

A brilliant but rather brief, and sometimes superficial, attempt at a definition, covering the field of comparative literature, Mr. Barzun's book distinguishes between intrinsic romanticism (a perennial element in human nature) and extrinsic or historic romanticism, which rises only under propitious circumstances when the inherently romantic in human nature is given unusual opportunity to express itself. Thus it may be an error to single out an individual or a movement as romantic in itself. Historically considered, the romantic spirit has always appeared when men have faced a "dissolving epoch" with the challenge for constructive and creative work but also with the crippling sense of "man's greatness and man's wretchedness," with the "double problem of making a new world and making it in the knowledge that man is both creative and limited, a doer and a sufferer, infinite in spirit and finite in action" (pp. 25-26). Mr. Barzun's little book is significant for its skilful defense of Rousseau and the German Romantics, its demonstration that it is uncritical to attribute the brutalities of nazism and fascism to a degenerate or a fanatically excessive romanticism, its penetrating analysis of "Romantic art" and "Romantic life," its suggestive tracing of the romantic spirit through realism, naturalism, and symbolism, and its provocative analysis of the "modern ego," with its self-consciousness, creative impotence, fear of committing itself, and obsession with sex.

On the other hand, as a series of lectures, Mr. Barzun's discussion frequently is weakened by vulnerable generalizations; and his rather high-handed definition of classicism in chapter iii, "The classic objection," lays him open to easy attack from scholars in neoclassicism.

On the whole, the work is an "essay," and one should not carp at the author for not doing what he did not set out to do. Yet many of us will regret that he did not use the last one hundred and twenty pages of his book for a more detailed and solid treatment of his main themes rather than for a section of miscellaneous definitions of "Romantic" and for "Notes and References," which, however readable, do comparatively little to give the work the substantial character it deserves.—

In the early years of the last decade, partly perhaps in anticipation of the centenary of the Oxford movement, three good anthologies of Newman were published. The present assemblage from Newman's writings is made on a principle different from that of the three earlier works. The editor believes definitely that Newman's best work was performed after his conversion to Rome, yet the book is designed not for those of what Newman called "the one faith" but for readers of whatever religious persuasion. The aim is not primarily to show the development of doctrine or to trace the growth of Newman's mind, though some of the longer passages offer examples of both, but, first, to present complete selections which will reveal clearly Newman's "presiding themes" and, second, to present excerpts and shorter works for leisurely and reflective reading. The emphasis throughout is upon Newman's literary artistry and religious leadership.

A highly approving word should be said concerning the thirty-two-page introduction. It reveals an exact and comprehensive knowledge not only of Newman but of the commentators upon him, to the opinions of some of whom the editor takes justifiable exception. As an essay "towards the understanding of Newman," the introduction attempts to explain the man and the mystery of his credulity in the skeptical modern world; to distinguish the leading subjects in Newman's work—the development of doctrine, the problem of faith, and the problem of higher education; and to present a close and helpful analysis of Newman's methods and style. All these purposes are admirably served.

For the general reader the principle upon which the materials are selected should in itself recommend this anthology above all others in the field. And this preference should be confirmed by the discriminating judgment shown not only in the selections but also in the editorial comment. A chronology and a select bibliography are provided.—Frederic E. Faverty.

A careful, well-constructed, and sympathetic biography; with none of the usual condescension to the Victorians when writing of so "Victorian" a figure as Charlotte M. Yonge. The author evaluates her subject from twentieth-century standards, yet takes us vividly into the nineteenth century. An admirable addition to the all-too-meager literature on those Victorians whose lives were shaped by the Oxford movement.—C. F. H.

VICTORIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY

THIS bibliography has been prepared by a committee of the Victorian Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America: William D. Templeman, chairman, University of Illinois; Charles Frederick Harold, Ohio State University; Austin Wright, Carnegie Institute of Technology; and William Irvine, Stanford University. It attempts to list the noteworthy publications of 1944 (including reviews of these and earlier items) that have a bearing on English literature of the Victorian period and similar publications of earlier date that have been inadvertently omitted from the preceding Victorian bibliography. Unless otherwise stated, the date of publication is 1944. Reference to a page in the bibliography for 1943, in Modern philology, May, 1944, is made by the following form: See VB 1943, 255. Some cross-references are given, although not all that are possible. For certain continuing bibliographical works, and for most of the abbreviations used, see the preceding Victorian bibliographies.

N. Smith in

MLN, LX (1945), 69-70; by P. Stern in NYTBR, June 11, p. 16.

The author states that this book is the first ever written with the purpose of proving the wide interest in American literature displayed by the English people. It succeeds in this purpose; and in the following two sentences I indicate two other ways in which it achieves notable success. This book makes an important addition to the slowly growing list of publications showing the interdependence of English and American literary work (creative and financial) in the nineteenth century. It provides, moreover, for present and future students of the period, suggestions that will lead to numerous further investigations and subsequent articles and books. For reasons given, the book deals chiefly with the period after 1832.

Chapter titles are "The booktrade," "The periodicals," "Humor," "Longfellow," "Of critics and influence." These make the book seem, at first glance, to be merely a collection of essays, but the author shows convincingly (pp. vii-viii) that the book is unified and the chapters are coherent.

I feel sure that the author could have written a book-length monograph on each of his chapter-topics. He is intentionally concise and selective: he informs us in the preface: "I have intended to present in simple exposition the broadest features of the topics along with a variety of particulars which serve as concrete illustrations." He points out, further, that a reader especially interested in the British reputation of only one of the major American writers can, by using the index, reconstruct from the scattered illustrations a "partial portrait."

A valuable appendix (pp. 150-80) lists "Representative articles on American literature appearing in British periodicals 1833 to 1901."

This is a scholarly book that no specialist in Victorian literature should fail to know.—W. D. T.

It is hoped, however, that the work may serve as a practical reader's guide." Surveys the entire field of books of the sea, even though with comparative superficiality. A critical account, usually of English and American books; three chapters give an account of sea stories, poetry, and plays in other languages. Final chapter treats "Essays and miscellanea." Reading list follows each chapter. Index, pp. 299-318. Frequent treatment of Victorians.

Smith, Byron Porter. Islam in English literature. Beirut, Lebanon: Printed at the Amer. pr., 1939. Pp. xii+258.

The first chapter, on the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, is very brief, so as to supplement rather than duplicate the material "so ably handled in Professor Chew's book The crescent and the rose (1937)." Studies intensively the Islamic material in English literature, with chapters on the ages of Dryden, Pope, and Johnson, one on the Romantic age and the Early Victorian age—and one on "The hero as prophet." This last discusses Carlyle's lecture on Mohammed and its subsequent effect on opinion concerning Mohammed and Islam and gives an estimate of the reception of Heroes and hero-worship by the Arab-speaking world. For each chapter after the first, the author's method is to present a brief summary of the political history of Moslem countries in the pertinent period and then a study of the records of travelers, the writings of historians and theologians, miscellaneous prose works, fiction, poetry, and the drama. In addition to the works of English authors, English translations from the Latin and from living European languages are considered. Unquestionably important in its field.—W. D. T.

- The Clark Lectures delivered in 1942 at Trinity College, Cambridge. They discuss Hardy's scope, power, art, weakness, and style. The lectures are fresh and stimulating, and Cecil has found many new things to say on old subjects and says them in a particularly attractive way. Like others who have studied the Wessex novels, he emerges with a sincere admiration for Hardy; in fact, "we do not just admire, we love him. . . . Behind the work stands the man." This excellent book ends with words well worth quoting in 1945: "Hardy was never hard. . . . The burning flame of his charity blazed all the higher for the infinite and unrelieved blackness of the universe."—Carl J. Weber.

- The summer number (Vol. VI, No. 3) contains four articles on Hopkins, and the autumn (No. 4) contains three. In order of appearance, they are: Herbert Marshall McLuhan, "The analogical mirrors" (pp. 322-32); Harold Whitehall, "Sprung rhythm" (pp. 333-54); Josephine Miles, "The sweet and lovely language" (pp. 355-68); Austin Warren, "Instress of inscape" (pp. 369-82); Robert Lowell, "A note" (pp. 583-86); Austin Warren, "Monument not quite needed" (pp. 587-89); Arthur Mizener, "Victorian Hopkins" (pp. 590-606).

In summarizing, Mizener says (p. 606) that the following conviction is "explicitly or implicitly endorsed" by all the contributors to the symposium: "that Hopkins is Victorian, in a good many respects obviously Victorian; and that it is only the integrity and skill with which he fulfilled the other impulses of his nature which tends to hinder our recognition of the fact that even in these impulses he represents his time."
